About one hundred years ago, during the Taisho Period, (1) lived a lovely little girl named Okiku in a small village in Iwamizawa on the island of Hokkaido. She had an elder brother Eikichi, (2) purchased a small doll for his beloved sister at an exposition (3) in Sapporo to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the foundation of Hokkaido.

Okiku adored the doll. She played house, went for a walk, and slept at night... (4) she did, she never parted with her newly acquainted friend, 5) to whom she grew attached day by day. The girl and the doll thus became inseparable, like twin sisters spending most of their time together. However, as is often the case with a kwaidan or a spooky story, the likes (6) Lafcadio Hearn might have loved to collect, Okiku suddenly passed away soon after (7) a flu, and that is when things started to get weird.

One day, as it turned out, her parents noticed that the hair of the doll was slightly longer than it had been before, and it was not long before they came to realize that its hair actually did keep growing. Naturally, they assumed that the spirit of their deceased daughter had come over the doll and remained there as if she (8) still alive. They named the doll after their daughter Okiku and prayed for her soul to rest in peace.

Then about two decades down the road, when the family decided to move out of Hokkaido, they took the Okiku doll to a temple named Mannen-ji which was located in the district, to entrust it to the temple so that a memorial service could be held for the departed every year.

This is how the Okiku doll ended up where it has been preserved 9) up to the present time.
